Remark Really More Than Suffering Street Car Passenger Could Stand Without Complaint.

At either end of a seat in a Broadway open car was an individual, the one at the far end smoking a very bad cigarette. Midway between these two sat something very fat. Not only was it very fat, but its but was fat with feathers, its fingers were fat with many jeweled rings, its neckwith beads and its corsage was superfatted with chains, lorgmiles, vanity (1) sexes and falls of lace. It was in fact so fat and so accurrently placed in the exact center it the cent that between it and the not room for the thinnest of passen-

The newcomer insignated her small frame between Mrs. Fainess and the mon with the bad cigarette. She wriegled, pried and shoved, but got no further than balfway back in the seat. Then she swept the cigarette gentleman with a scathing glance. "Kindly move over," said she to him with considerable acidity.

The gentleman had paid no attention to her shovings and wrigglings, since he was too tightly jammed raninst the rall to have them matter one way or the other. But this was too much. He slowly turned and looked at her, pressing his lips togethor on one side to hold the cigarette in safety. Then he growled: "Kindly direct your remark to the dime reaseum thing on your right."-New York Press.
